

2021 Construction Economic Outlook

with a focus on Georgia-specific data

A new industry outlook finds most contractors expect demand for many categories of construction to decline, few firms expect the industry to recover to pre-pandemic levels soon

Most contractors expect demand for many types of construction to shrink in 2021 even as the pandemic is prompting many owners to delay or cancel already-planned projects, meaning few firms will hire new workers, according to survey results released in early January 2021 by the AGC of America and Sage Construction and Real Estate.

Ken Simonson reported to his first day of work with AGC of America on September 10, 2001. This means he's seen just about everything when it comes to how the nation's economy impacts the construction industry and vice versa. He is highly respected in his field, and we are pleased to have him speak to AGC Georgia members. He'll break down the latest economic projections from a national perspective and then dive into the recently released survey results that look at Georgia-specific responses.

Don't miss this opportunity to gain valuable insight that will help you better prepare your business for the coming year.
