

Hard Hat Safety

What should you look for in the best of the best safety features?

Are you putting your money where your mouth is when it comes to safety equipment for workers on your construction jobsites? While hard hats are required PPE for workers on most types of projects, who on your executive and safety teams is knowledgeable about the types of materials used to make hard hats?

As modern technology evolves at lightning speed, and advancements in jobsite safety equipment grow exponentially, the design of most hard hats in use today isn't too different from what it was several decades ago. While climbing-style helmets are starting to be introduced, a vast majority of workers are provided with equipment that may not provide optimum protection.

Serious brain injuries can occur on construction sites from a variety of hazards. How should your company decide which hard hat or helmet is best for your workers? Are you considering which types of specific hazards everyone is exposed to on your jobsites? What guidelines are you using to choose the required level of hard hat for your project?

In this session, you'll learn the differences between Type I & Type II hard hats and the pros and cons for helmets. There will be hands on demonstrations with both hard hats and helmets to help you better understand the levels of protection.
